

Under the spotlight:
reviewing police and crime plans for multiple and complex needs, and transition to adulthood

Revolving Doors Agency

Revolving Doors Agency is a charity working to change systems and improve services for people with multiple and complex needs who are in repeat contact with the criminal justice system – the ‘revolving door’ group. The multiple problems faced by this group can include poor mental health, substance misuse, repeat victimisation including domestic violence, homelessness, family breakdown and persistent poverty, alongside many of the social determinants and excluding factors that can make it difficult to break out of the cycle. Our research shows that these men and women need support from a range of agencies, but that services are often poorly equipped to engage, treat and support them even when they are able to access appropriate services. We have also shown that local leaders and partnerships can deliver focused solutions that enable them to transform their lives, reducing crime and making communities safer.

Barrow Cadbury Trust

This report has been supported by the Barrow Cadbury Trust, as a contribution to its Transition to Adulthood (T2A) initiative a ten-year campaign to develop evidence and promote effective approaches to young adults aged 18-25 at all stages of the criminal justice system. The campaign is led by a coalition of 16 leading criminal justice, health and youth charities - the T2A Alliance, whose members are: Addaction, BTEG, Care Leavers' Association, Catch 22, Centre for Crime and Justice Studies (CCJS), CLINKS, Criminal Justice Alliance (CJA), Howard League for Penal Reform, Nacro, The Prince's Trust, Prison Reform Trust, the Restorative Justice Council, Revolving Doors Agency, Together for Mental Wellbeing, the Young Foundation and Young Minds.

Second Generation

The first generation of PCCs showed themselves to be important local leaders, with many using the role's profile to forge new partnerships and develop innovative solutions in their area. Our spotlights have documented some of the innovative practice amongst PCCs in relation to young adults, reducing reoffending, women and mental health. The Home Office and Ministry of Justice are considering extending the PCC remit to cover wider responsibilities, with control of other 'blue light' services already provided for in legislation. As part of the T2A Alliance, Revolving Doors has led a successful project with the first generation of PCCs.

After the election of the second generation of PCCs we embarked on a successor project – 'Second Generation'. The aim of this project is to support the second generation of PCCs to better understand and to develop solutions to the issues faced by both the 'revolving doors' group and young adults in contact with the criminal justice system, and to continue to work with re-elected PCCs to further develop their work.

About this review of Police and Crime Plans

Since the election of the first Police and Crime Commissioners (PCCs) in November 2012, PCCs have emerged as influential leaders at a local and national level. Faced with the difficult challenge of balancing limited resources while meeting constantly changing local needs, they have shown a willingness to innovate and to take risks. One of the pivotal aspects of the role is that PCCs are not only responsible for holding the police to account, setting police budgets and priorities and, ultimately, hiring and firing chief constables, but also for the many aspects of the 'and crime' part of their title.

In many respects, the 'and crime' part of the role interests Revolving Doors Agency at least as much as the 'police' part. It is in this area that PCCs have shown an appetite for dealing with difficult local problems, at individual and community level, through the commissioning of services and through thinking at systems level. Moreover, some have used the role in other ways, including using their public profile to bring together stakeholders and fellow local leaders from other sectors to respond to local need and find creative ways of addressing often deep-seated problems. Many also contribute at strategic level to the functioning of other systems through, for example, representation on local authority health and wellbeing boards.

This document presents a review of both the current and the most recent previous Police and Crime Plans for each PCC – the principal document that sets out for the public what PCCs are prioritising in their areas. The aim was to both explore how the plans reflect the breadth of multiple and complex needs (the key area of interest for Revolving Doors), as well as to other specific groups, such as young adults (to inform the work of the Transition to Adulthood Alliance) and women, to provide a tool for identifying the PCCs' areas of interest.

The plans were examined on three different levels: how needs of the population in a PCC area were assessed; what needs were identified; and what priorities have been established as a result to meet these needs, reduce crime and prevent harm.

In addition to this report, Revolving Doors has produced an interactive map highlighting key findings. This can be accessed by clicking here, or by typing this URL into a browser <http://www.revolving-doors.org.uk/pc-map-2017>

Engagement with offices of Police and Crime Commissioners

Since 2012, Revolving Doors has worked with PCCs around the country on a series of projects. Engagement has included activities such as support to convene meetings of specialist providers to providing input to locally designed and commissioned programmes. This partnership working is important to us, and is one of the ways in which Revolving Doors aims to improve policy and services at a local level.

Prior to publication, Revolving Doors contacted the office of every PCC and shared the table setting out the summary of the Police and Crime Plan. This was done to give PCCs and their offices (OPCCs) the opportunity to comment on any omissions or misunderstandings. Revolving Doors has applied a consistent policy of only including needs and priorities if they are referred to in the published Police and Crime Plan, given that these are the formal public-facing document published by PCCs. We have, however, offered PCCs the opportunity to respond to the summary, and to provide a short overview of relevant information not contained in the plan. Where an OPCC has provided a response, it is included beneath the relevant summary table in Appendix C: full summary of all past and present Police and Crime Plans.

Limitations

Revolving Doors has been in discussion with OPCCs throughout the development of this review. They have argued, reasonably, that many of the topics of interest to Revolving Doors will sit at an operational rather than strategic level, or that they may sit in strategies outside the main Police and Crime Plan. In this respect, there is some risk of a 'false negative' – where the absence of a need or priority from a Police and Crime Plan should not be taken to mean that there is no work or interest in this subject within a particular area. In addition to needs identified and priorities established, this extends to the approaches used to identifying those needs and priorities. In all areas these are likely to have involved, alongside consultation exercises, a range of analysis of police and offender datasets, in addition to other local and national data, and engagement with key stakeholders such as local authorities.

One explanation for this is that some aspects police and community safety work have effectively become mainstream. This might include areas such as mental ill health and mental health crisis responses, and responses to substance misuse, particularly heroin and crack cocaine misuse. With regard to substance misuse, for example, we know from discussions with PCCs and OPCCs that interest is more or less universal, that many continue to support partnership work with specialist substance misuse services, and that some are implementing or considering innovative measures and responses, including new approaches to reducing the health and crime impacts of opiate misuse. Not every aspect of these areas of work are reflected in Police and Crime Plans, and the mainstreaming of such essential work is to be welcomed. However, given that the public would turn to the plans to understand what is happening in their areas, PCCs should consider how they ensure that mainstream work is communicated.

It is important to emphasise that this review reflects the areas of interest to Revolving Doors, multiple and complex needs and groups with particular vulnerabilities, rather than the entire scope of the Police and Crime Plans.

Finally, it is reasonable to assume that some priorities will be common to all PCCs, whether they feature in Police and Crime Plans or not. Thus we have excluded statutory responsibilities, as well as matters such as value for money. We have included organised and gang crime where it has been included as a local priority or threat rather than as a Strategic Policing Requirement.

Notwithstanding these limitations, Police and Crime Plans are the primary means by which PCCs communicate their police and crime priorities to their electorate and the wider stakeholder community, and we hope that this review and the accompanying interactive map will be of interest and use.

Partnership work and next steps

One of the most effective ways that PCCs can inform responses to multiple and complex needs and groups with distinct vulnerabilities is through commissioning, stimulating or otherwise supporting partnership work. Revolving Doors has explored examples of this in our series of concise spotlight briefings, which highlight promising examples of practice², and also in Rebalancing Act³, which we published jointly with the Home Office and Public Health England.

We will be augmenting and updating these resources in the coming 12 months with further short thematic briefings based on the findings of this report, alongside a report on co-commissioning, which will highlight some of the structures, processes, and governance arrangements adopted, and some of the outcomes achieved. This review has also identified some curiosities, such as a possible reduction in the focus on families, and the way that housing and homelessness – identified as a key need in around a third of plans – is being addressed by OPCCs and their police services.

In particular, we hope to highlight in more detail some of the examples referred to in the Police and Crime Plans reviewed for this report. These include co-commissioning services with local authorities, clinical commissioning groups and housing associations, innovative working with other 'blue light' services, supporting the colocation of services for vulnerable adults and those with multiple and complex needs, and developing new services for vulnerable victims.

Revolving Doors is continuing to work with PCCs around the country, and will shortly be writing to all OPCCs to offer further support around the theme of multiple and complex needs.

It centres on seven key strategic priorities (two of which focus primarily on the performance of the Force) as well as building on the manifesto promises made during the election and the threats and risks identified with partners.

The 'supporting vulnerable people' priority also includes an emphasis on helping people get the support they need before they reach crisis point. There's not a one-size fits all approach and by re-organising the policing teams and their partnerships to focus on issues in a place, we will build a better and more responsive service."

Northumbria OPPC response:

“The priorities within the Police and Crime Plan ensure Northumbria remains a great place to live and work and reflect those identified by our communities. Policing is changing and we know that policing requires different resources and skills to respond effectively. A new priority ‘Effective Criminal Justice System’ focuses on vulnerable and intimidated witnesses, including those with mental health problems and learning difficulties. Throughout the plan victims are a primary focus, understanding their needs and responding with specialised interventions to help them cope and recover. The Surrey OPCC is involved in commissioning a number of services and projects which help support victims and during 2016/17 we have continued supporting some brilliant outreach services, charities and voluntary groups who do great work across the county in areas of domestic abuse, child sexual exploitation and rape and serious sexual assault.

In January we recruited a policy officer for a newly created Criminal Justice post who is developing a number of projects designed to reduce re-offending including housing and accommodation schemes, and 'through the gate' prisoner programmes. In addition the OPCC funded a brand new project aimed at helping vulnerable people struggling with severe alcohol and drug issues."

West Midlands OPPC response:

"The PCC is an active member of the West Midlands Combined Authority Wellbeing Board, promoting health and mental health needs of those in the CJS. More specifically:

- reviewing our custody visiting scheme (to promote safer detention);*
- providing funding for the Engager programme at Featherstone prison (providing support for prisoners pre/post release with mental health problems but may fall 'below the radar' of other services); and*
- building on the success of the Roots for Life programme, (targeting those at risk of entering the CJS with mental health problem and helping them gain employment).*

The PCC has also refreshed the Local Criminal Justice Board, improving collaborative working and outcomes for those in contact with the CJS, with a priority theme of disproportionality, including those with complex and mental health needs."

Our outcomes and priorities are interlinked and require the efforts of multiple organisations, therefore our focus is very much on the police and partners working together for the benefit of the community. Where possible we seek to prevent and intervene earlier to avoid people entering the criminal justice system, and support those who have, by working together to solve the bigger problems linked to reoffending.
